When young, it has a very bright blue color on its sides and back, with a touch of silver on the under part of the body. Later it becomes a deep crimson, with a bright olive-green head. The flesh is, at all times, a brilliant red, but is firmer and drier than that of the Royal Chinook. The fish are also smaller than the kings of the tribe, rarely exceeding an average weight of eight pounds at four years of age. Descending the scale of value we come next to the silver salmon, a rather poor fish, that sells at low prices. When canned it is worth only about half as much as the red salmon. The humpback salmon is yet cheaper, but great quantities are sold among the negroes in the South and in the markets...
