Not illustrated. 1841 Excerpt: .of the birds and the unwritten strains of iEolus and the eloquent cadences of progressing vegetation. The language of their tints and pencilings, the red and yellow dyes awaken memories Of treasures gone, Of sainted friends called too soon away, Of light, from this worJ d taken while it shone, Yet kindling onward to the perfect day. The leaves of Autumn are now rustling over the grave of one of our most gifted poets, whose lowly bed has been made since the time of their budding--of one who delighted in the works of nature, and whose lyre gave forth the richest tones when discoursing of the history of human life, its hopes and sorrows from the emblems furnished by Leaf and flower and forest tree. The following poem, if we mistake not, was one of the earliest, as it is one of the best ever penned by the lamented Willis Gaylord Clark. We have learned from some source, where we cannot now recollect, that this poem was sent to one of the daily papers of this city, we think the New York American, for publication, and was rejected! A year elapsed and the rejected poem found a place in the talented pages of an English Magazine, from whence it was transferred, as a brilliant gem, to the columns of the journal, where, as an article of home production, it had been denied a place. O. S. B. AUTUMN LEAVES. Sear Autumn Leaves!--what tales they tell Of...
