Everybody came to look at him, --and no one could look at him without laughing; and fewer could look upon his young master, dressed in his top boots, without laughing a great deal more. After this, Neddy led a quiet life for some time; the only duty he was called upon to perform being that of conveying his young master about, down dusty roads, or dirty lanes. As to thistles, --not being a Scotch donkey, he had no national feeling towards them: as to grass, he cared little about it.--He was a gentleman s donkey now, and could afford to eat oats and beans. He wanted to be free, and tried to gnaw the rope that bound...
